

Be a good provider

Whether or not your wife works as well it's probable that you are the main income earner in the home and are the main provider for your family.

As statistics show that a woman is more attracted to a man who is a good provider (this means that he is gainfully employed, brings home the money, and is happy to do it), it makes sense for you to have a good, reliable job that you enjoy. Job satisfaction will play an important role in this, as mentioned above. If your wife knows you are happy to go to work and you don't mind being there and supporting the family, that will be a huge load off her mind and she will be much more inclined to want to support you.

But if you've lost interest in going to work, you come home cranky or you resent supporting your family, it might be time to consider getting another job, maybe even in an entirely different profession.

Perhaps there are other factors that determine whether or not you can provide financially for your family. In which case, it may be beneficial for your family if your wife actually becomes the main financial earner and you take on the role of supporting the family at home. Should that be the case, it's best if you, as would your wife, undertake that role well fulfil your part.
